INTRODUCTION

This is the latest report in a series of lists of oil and gas exploration wells in Kansas that have penetrated Precambrian rocks. An earlier report (Cole and Ebanks, 1974) listed all such wells through 1972. This report is a compilation of basement test wells drilled in all previous years through 1978. Information for the last six years is integrated with the earlier list and all data are presented in the same format used in previous publications of this type. Additionally, every effort has been made to correct errors, however slight, in the earlier work. The total number of wells drilled to the Precambrian in Kansas, as of the end of 1978, is approximately 3050.

LIST OF WELLS DRILLED TO THE PRECAMBRIAN

The list of wells (Table 1), arranged in geographic order by township and range, for the west ranges and then for the east ranges, includes a state-county code, name of the well, location, surface elevation, drilled depth to Precambrian rock, subsea elevation of this depth, the type of Precambrian rock encountered, the stratigraphic unit overlying Precambrian, total depth of the well, and the year in which it was drilled, in that order. Keys to the abbreviations used in Table 1 are given below.

CURRENT RESEARCH

The data presented in this report are used to update an earlier map of the configuration of the top of Precambrian rocks in Kansas (Cole, 1976). Actual penetrations of basement rocks are important in improving our knowledge of this important datum. Maps published earlier have not been changed significantly by the addition of data in the last three years. Most basement tests are drilled in areas where there is already an abundance of other such wells.

Other studies that may improve our understanding of the shape and composition of the basement rocks beneath the Kansas are studies of their magnetism and petrology. Yarger and others (1978) have presented in map form the results of extensive aeromagnetic surveying of eastern Kansas. Flying of similar surveys in western Kansas is in progress. The patterns of aeromagnetic anomalies discovered by the surveys present interesting problems in the interpretation of the structure and composition of basement rocks. Bickford and others (in press) are carrying out accompanying studies on petrography and geochemistry of basement rocks in Kansas. These studies have resulted in recognition of several important distinctions in the types and ages of Kansas basement rocks. The best interpretation of these data probably will result from their integration with the aeromagnetic data.

Also being studied through determination of Precambrian rocks in Kansas are the location of epicenters and frequency of low-intensity earthquakes. A network of seismometers in Kansas and adjoining states is being used to detect microearthquakes and to use these events to understand patterns of instability and possible faulting in basement rocks.

The structure of Precambrian rocks is important also in locating areas of potential mineralization, such as the areas of major uplift and faulting. Fault zones in basement rocks are considered possible avenues for movement upward of fluids from deeper in the earth's crust that may deposit minerals in shallower formations. The possible relationship between basement faulting and mineral-bearing waters is also being investigated in southeastern Kansas, where such waters are a possible source of radium, a contaminant of groundwater supplies in rocks overlying the basement.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Research results such as those cited above are testimony to the farsightedness of the Basement Rock Committee of the Kansas Geological Society, whose members have promoted interest in the accumulation and use of data on Precambrian rocks in Kansas. Without the cooperation of the oil and gas industry, in general, this effort would not have been possible. We gratefully acknowledge the assistance of Owen Spitz, Donna Saile, Teresa Jewell, and Patricia Renjifo of the Kansas Geological Survey, in preparing this publication for printing.
